The Sea, a Man Booker Prize winning novel by the Irish novelist John Banville (2005), is an example of this difficulty to draw a line between the new realism and postmodernism. With its realistic setting and characters, the novel may seem not to follow the peculiarities evident in ...

“The Old Illusion of Belonging”: Distinctive Style, Bad ...

John Banville's The Sea (2005) is not only a highly stylistic novel but also a novel about style. In The Sea Banville poses his obsessive question of identity and authenticity in relation to style as writing as well as writing as style and complicates the notion of style as traditionally understood in literary criticism.
